

Name: Joshua Esoimeme

Age: 14 years

School: The Vale College

Email: toyinesoimeme@gmail.com

A Call for Revolution

Our planet is on the verge of destruction and many animal species are becoming extinct, forests are being destroyed to build industries and houses but we fail to realize that the habitation of animals are being destroyed as well. Our once blue skies are now filled with smoke from vehicles and machineries. Seas and oceans are polluted with plastic waste. All these has led to climate change conditions including the depletion of the ozone layer, which increases the risks of diseases like cancer.

Generation restoration means rethinking how we live. It means protecting our seas and oceans by putting policies in place to guard against dumping of waste into water bodies, planting trees, proper disposal and recycling of plastic waste and choosing sustainability over destruction.

Many organisations have made efforts to save the future. Governmental organisations are now restricting people to the number of trees they are allowed to cut and have made a law that for every tree cut, two trees must be planted.

Shaping our future is not something that is done in a day; it is a continual process and a responsibility we all share for ourselves and generations to come.